

USING FORM BOOKS

Every office should have a form book, a set of form books, which contain all forms used repeatedly in the office. The forms should be set up in such a way that anyone using them can change the pertinent information in the form to coincide with the case being worked on.

As new forms are added, you may find that a separate form book for each area of law in which you practice will be easier to use, e.g., one book for probate forms, one book for litigation forms, one book for corporate forms, etc. Ideally, instructions should be included with each form indicating how many copies are needed, what is done with the form once it has been prepared (i.e., filing or recording), if a fee is needed, if the client needs to sign the form, etc.

Be sure to immediately change standard terminology in forms when changes in law or procedure necessitate a change in the form. It is a good idea to review all forms and corresponding instructions following a legislative session and when new court rules go into effect. Failure to immediately change forms in your form book may mean the change does not get made the next time the form is used. If the mistake is not caught, the result could be disastrous to the client. The ultimate responsibility for giving legal advice remains with the lawyer. Reliance on the perceived correctness of the legal form will not excuse any act of legal malpractice. The lawyer must always exercise reasonable professional judgment in adopting forms and boilerplate language in the creation of legal documents.

IMPORTANT NOTICES

This material is provided for informational purposes only and does not establish, report, or create the standard of care for attorneys in Oregon, nor does it represent a complete analysis of the topics presented. Readers should conduct their own appropriate legal research. The information presented does not represent legal advice. This information may not be republished, sold, or used in any other form without the written consent of the Oregon State Bar Professional Liability Fund, except that permission is granted for Oregon lawyers to use and modify these materials for use in their own practices. © 2021 OSB Professional Liability Fund